The Kachina

2003

Many of the Pueblo Indians have special ceremonies with masked men that they call "Kachinas". These Kachinas are the most important people in their ceremonies. The good Kachinas are supposed to be the spirits of very good men while some represent bad spirits and demons. To Hopi children, the Kachinas are like Santa Claus, bringing gifts of Kachinas at certain seasons. On the day of the ceremony each child is given a Kachina made just for them by their relatives. The children take the Kachinas home and their parents hang them on the walls or ceilings so they can always be seen. This is the way the Hopi children learn to know all the different Kachinas and what they look like. To Hopi Indians, Kachinas are not idols to be worshiped or prayed to, but they are merely objects used to teach their children about good and evil.

The Kachina II

2003

For days before a Kachina ceremony, fathers, grandfathers, and uncles are busy making Kachinas in the likeness of the Kachina dancers. These Kachinas are most important to the Hopi and Zuni Indians because they represent some of the supernatural beings that exist in many of the Pueblo ceremonies and dances.
